Porky Pig awakened with a start and opened his eyes. The room was dark with the warm June night and there was no sound. But Porky was sure that someone had called his name.

He lay still, listening. Then he heard the sound again.

"Porky! Hey, Porky! Wake up!" The call came from the open window.

Porky slid from his bed and tiptoed to the window. Cautiously he peered out. Bugs Bunny was standing under the window, looking up at him.

"B-Bugs!" Porky exclaimed in surprise. "Wh-What're you d-doin' h-here at this t-time of n-night?"

"It isn't night!" Bugs contradicted in a loud whisper. "It's four o'clock! Almost morning! Get up an' let's go swimmin' in ole Horace Hogg's pond!"

"W-We c-can't! W-We aren't allowed t-to s-swim there!" Porky protested, remembering the high fence around Mister Hogg's pond and the many signs on the fence—signs which said, "No Trespassing" and "Keep Out" and "Swimming Forbidden," in large black letters.

"Everybody'll be asleep at this time in the morning, so nobody'll know we're there!" Bugs insisted.

"B-But . . ." Porky began.

"Quit bein' a fraidy-cat!" Bugs jeered. "We won't hurt anybody or anything by takin' a li'l dip! Besides, mean ole Horace Hogg's got no right to fence off the only good swimmin' pond around here, these hot days!"

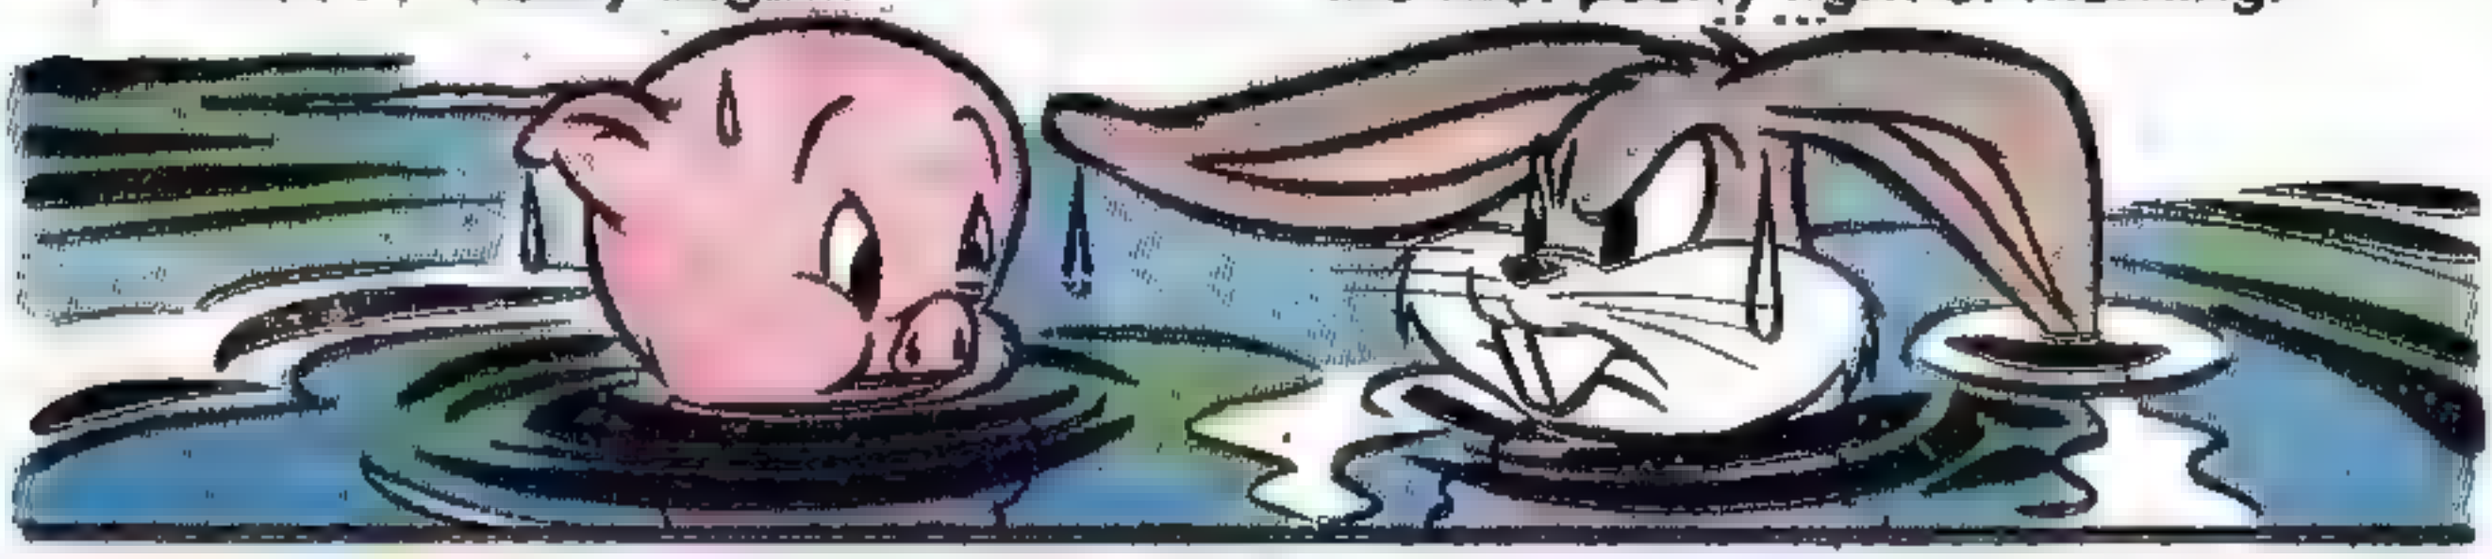
Still Porky hesitated. He was afraid of big, frightening Horace Hogg with his deep bellow of a voice and his scowling face. But, oh, how he wanted to swim in the cool, clear water of that pond, shaded by the dripping green of willow trees.

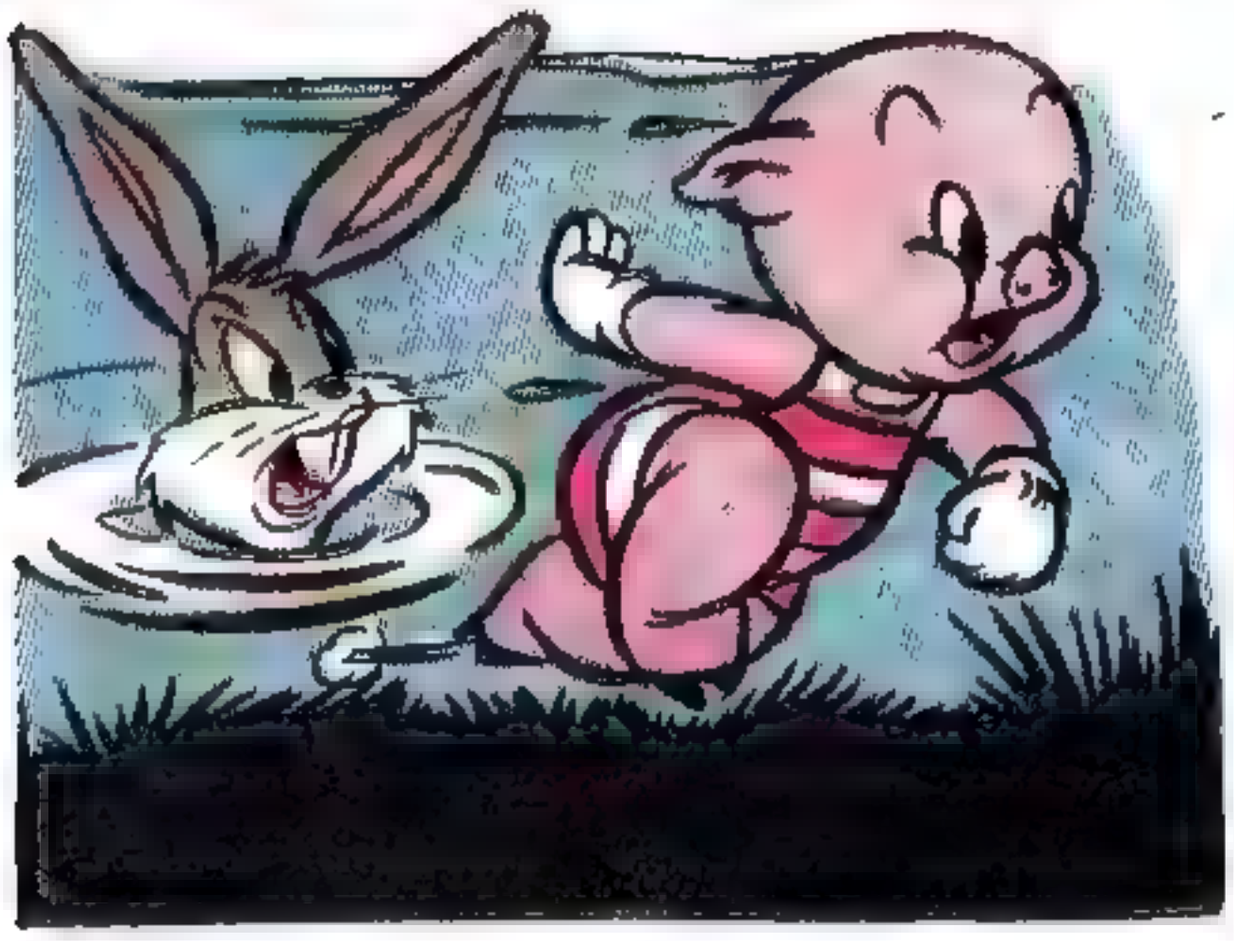
"Scaredy Cat!" Bugs taunted. "I'll tell everybody that you're afraid of a few li'l ole signs. S'long!"

Then Porky weakened. "W-Wait a m-minute, B-Bugs! I'll g-go with you," he called in a loud whisper.

"It'll be fun to put something over on that ole meanie of a Horace Hogg," Bugs chuckled. "He's a stingy ole codger for not lettin' kids swim in that pond on hot summer days!"

Soon they reached the edge of Horace Hogg's farm. They ran swiftly and silently across the fields toward the pond, carefully skirting the big, dark house. They climbed the fence with its many signs and stood, at last, on the edge of the forbidden pond. The water looked beautiful and cool and clear in the first pearly light of morning.





With low yells of joy, Bugs and Porky plunged into the water and splashed happily. Merrily they swam 'round and 'round the pond.

"It's not very deep over here! I can touch bottom!" Bugs called after a while from a place near the shore of the pond. "Look! I'm standin' up!"

Porky looked. Bugs's head and shoulders were sticking up out of the water as his feet rested on the bottom.

Then, as Porky watched, the grin on Bugs's face changed to a frown of surprise. A moment later the frown turned to a wild grimace of terror.

"Hey!" he yelled. "I can't pull my feet outa the mud on the bottom! I'm sinkin' deeper an' deeper! Help me, Porky!"

Porky swam over to him and Bugs grabbed him with a frantic grasp.

"Don't touch bottom or you'll sink, too!" Bugs warned in a loud voice. "Just let me pull on you!"

Porky kept afloat while Bugs tugged and struggled, but he couldn't pull himself free of the oozy mud which was sucking him down.

"Run to the house for help! Quick!" Bugs screamed finally. "I'm goin' down deeper an' deeper! I'll drown!"

Porky looked at Bugs and horror gripped him, too. Bugs's shoulders were now out of sight and the water was almost touching his chin.

Porky swam swiftly to shore, grabbed his jacket and raced toward the house. Fear for Bugs made him forget his terror of the ominous Horace Hogg. He was panting for breath when he pounded on the door and he almost sobbed with relief when he saw the once-dreaded face of Mister Hogg.

"C-Come quick!" he gasped. "B-Bugs is d-drowning in the p-pond!"

Horace Hogg didn't even wait to answer him. He grabbed a coil of heavy rope and ran with lumbering speed toward the pond. Porky followed him.

When they reached the pond, only Bugs's eyes and nose and ears could be seen above the water.

"Don't move and don't struggle!" Horace Hogg ordered, deftly making a noose in the rope. He flung the rope like a lariat. The noose circled Bugs's head and slid down around his body under the water.

Then Horace Hogg pulled and jerked with all his massive strength. After minutes, which seemed like hours, he finally dragged a weak, mud-smeared Bugs to shore.

Horace Hogg said nothing. He waited until Bugs had recovered his breath and strength. Then he looked at the trembling Bugs and Porky, who stared back at him with frightened, pleading eyes.

"I guess you've had enough punishment!" Horace Hogg said after a while. "Maybe this'll teach you to obey signs on private property. The bottom of that pond is made of QUICKSAND. It makes the pond too dangerous for swimming. That's why I built that fence to keep people out!"

"Oh!" Porky and Bugs gasped in one breath.

"I'll never disobey signs again!" Bugs gulped.

"N-Neither w-will I," Porky stammered.

And they never did!
